Site audit: Kaya Skin Clinic

Trainee: Amna

Site assigned: https://www.kayaskinclinic.com/

Read on: 3 November 2026 (Asia/Karachi)

The assigned address redirects to the UAE English site, `https://www.kayaskinclinic.com/uae/en`. A `/pk/en/` path returns 404. The five pages below are the live UAE pages closest to the two blog topics and to a first visit. Treatment pages are built in the browser, so the title and description are what a results snippet can rely on. Visible body copy was thin in the first HTML response. That is noted, and it is not filled in with invented clinic statistics.

The training rule: title within 60 characters, focus keyword near the start, brand at the end. Description between 140 and 155 characters, with the keyword and a call to book or read. New copy does not promise a result and does not repeat customer counts.

1. Homepage

- URL: https://www.kayaskinclinic.com/uae/en
- Live title (68): Kaya Skin Clinic UAE – Skin Care, Body And Hair Treatment Specialist
- Live description (158): Kaya Skin Clinic is one of the largest skincare clinics in Middle East with 20 clinics in the region, 24 dermatologists, and over 350,000 satisfied customers.

The title is 8 characters over 60, and it starts with the brand instead of the service. The description is 3 characters over 155. It spends that space on size and customer figures. The homepage text retrieved with the page showed different figures ("15 UAE Clinics" and "600,000 Customers"). The snippet and the page do not match. New copy leaves the numbers out. A conflicting figure is worse than no figure.

The visible heading on the page was "Beauty that runs deep". That line does not say what the clinic treats, so the meta description has to do that job.

2. Laser hair removal

- URL: https://www.kayaskinclinic.com/uae/en/treatments/laser-hair-removal
- Live title (82): Laser Hair Removal in UAE | Long-Term Hair Reduction and Smooth Skin | Kaya Clinic
- Live description (187): Explore Laser Hair Removal in UAE at Kaya Clinic for smoother skin, reduced maintenance, and long-term hair reduction tailored to diverse skin tones, treatment areas, and lifestyle needs.

The keyword is in the right place, and the brand is at the end. Both fields are far too long: 22 characters over on the title and 32 on the description. The extra words are result language ("long-term hair reduction", "smoother skin", "reduced maintenance"). The training rule for clinic writing is no promise of results. A snippet should offer a consultation, not an outcome.

3. Acne and acne scars

- URL: https://www.kayaskinclinic.com/uae/en/treatments/acne-acne-scar
- Live title (79): Acne Treatment in UAE | Pimples, Oily Skin and Breakout Solutions | Kaya Clinic
- Live description (213): Ice pick, boxcar, rolling scars, or acne marks? Learn the different types of acne scars, compare laser vs chemical peel treatments, and discover how many sessions you may need. Expert guide from Kaya Clinic Dubai.

The title is 19 characters over, and "solutions" sounds like a cure. The description is 58 characters over. "How many sessions you may need" teases a number this submission will not invent, and it implies the article can prescribe a course. The brand is present, which is good. The city "Dubai" appears only at the end of a description that is already about the UAE page.

4. About the clinic

- URL: https://www.kayaskinclinic.com/uae/en/about-us
- Live title (85): The Kaya Skin Clinic Story - Trusted by over 350,000 Customers | Kaya Skin Clinic UAE
- Live description (166): Kaya Skin Clinic, an international chain specialises in advanced dermatological solutions for women and men, with its commitment to comprehensive aesthetic skin care.

The title is 25 characters over, mostly because it repeats the brand and inserts a customer count that does not match the homepage snippet (350,000 in both of these, against 600,000 on the homepage text). The description is 11 characters over and says "solutions", which is a soft promise. A first-visit page should say who the clinic is for and how to book.

5. Meet the experts

- URL: https://www.kayaskinclinic.com/uae/en/meet-the-experts
- Live title (69): Meet Our Best Dermatologist in United Arab Emirates| Kaya Skin Clinic
- Live description (169): Meet the team of best dermatologists at Kaya Skin Clinic UAE. Our team of highly qualified specialists offers personalized skin and hair care. Book an appointment today!

The description does have a call to action, which the other pages often miss. It is 14 characters over, and "best" is a ranking the page does not need. The title is 9 characters over, misses a space before the pipe, and says "dermatologist" in the singular while the page is a team. The keyword is close to the start. That part can stay.

What the five pages share

Keyword and brand placement is often half right, and length is the failure. Clinic pages also use result language and headcount figures that disagree with each other. The replacements stay inside the character rules, name the service first, end with "Kaya Clinic", and invite a consultation or a read. They do not say a treatment will work, and they do not quote a number of clinics, doctors, customers or sessions.

FAQ intent

Will it guarantee a result, will it hurt, what if the skin on the area is already troubled, and what should someone bring. Every answer sends the decision back to a clinician who has seen the person.

Laser Hair Removal: What to Expect Before, During and After Treatment

1,084 words. The assigned range is 1,000–1,200.

Status: draft. Not the submitted version.

People ask for laser hair removal after they are tired of dealing with hair at home. A fair answer starts with a conversation, not with a promise. This draft says what to expect before, during and after a clinic visit. It does not say the hair will stop, that the skin will look a particular way, or that the visit will feel like nothing. Hair, skin, hormones, medicines and the body area change the answer. A clinician who has seen you is the only person who can give it.

If another page already sounds sure about your result, leave that page. Certainty without an examination is advertising.

Book the talk first

Do not arrive having decided from a photograph. Read what the clinic publishes about the service, then sit with a person and ask whether it fits you. You can leave without booking a treatment. You can ask for the aftercare in writing. Background about the clinic is not the appointment.

Take a written list into the room. Medicines, including creams. Skin that is already sore, broken or infected. Recent sun and any self-tan. How you remove hair now, and when you last did it. Pregnancy, trying for pregnancy, or breastfeeding: say it, do not wait. A hormonal condition, or hair that changed when your health changed: say that too, and let them interpret it. They cannot see a fact you hide.

Then ask a short set of questions. Is this area suitable, and why? Will they look first, and do they sometimes test a small patch? Which home methods should you stop, and from when? Their timetable is the one you follow. A video timetable is not. What do they use to protect eyes if the face is involved? What is a reason to phone the clinic the same day? Who will actually perform the visit?

A vague answer is a reason to pause. A clear refusal is a useful result. It means the treatment was never yours to book.

In the room

They should describe the next step before they take it. You should know the area, how you will lie or sit, and the words or gesture that mean pause. If you feel you cannot speak, the visit is already wrong.

Sensation is personal. This draft will not call it mild. Ask what their patients usually say, and treat the reply as their experience rather than a promise. If you need them to stop, say so. Duration depends on the area. A single time quoted before anyone has looked is a guess. Ask what they expect for you, and what happens if the visit ends early.

Near the eyes, ask what you wear and what they wear. Ordinary sunglasses are not clinic kit. You may also ask why that device, for your skin and hair, today. You are not expected to learn the engineering. You are expected to hear a reason that mentions you, not only the clinic’s habit.

Afterwards

Before you go home, ask what they expect you to notice and what should make you call. Write both down. Do not score your evening against a photograph of a stranger.

Ask about sun, heat, sport, makeup and the products you meant to use on that skin. If they give a number of days, it is their number. This draft will not invent one. A sheet beats a cheerful “you will be fine”. If that is all they offer, ask them to be specific while you are still in the chair.

Do not pick or scrub. Do not add a wax or a peel because the week looks empty. If you want another treatment as well, ask whether the two can be close. Further visits are their decision. So is stopping. Very light, grey or white hair, and a recent hormone change, are things to mention, not things for an article to rule on.

What this draft refuses

It is not a diagnosis or a plan. It does not permit home treatment of broken, infected or recently operated skin. It does not print a guarantee. Skin that is already spotted, painful or scarred may need a different conversation. Say so at the start. Anyone who cannot consent, including a child, needs the clinic’s own rule and the right adult in the room. This page does not invent an age.

Ask how a test patch works

Many people have heard that a clinic may try a small area first. Do not treat that rumour as a step you can demand, and do not treat its absence as a shortcut. Ask whether this clinic uses a patch test for someone like you, what they are watching for, and how long they want you to wait before a wider visit. If they do not use one, ask what they use instead to judge your skin. Write the answer down. A waiting period, if they give you one, is theirs. This draft will not supply a number of days, because a borrowed number is how people ignore the person who examined them.

Also ask what “stop” means in practice: who you call, what the clinic needs to see, and whether you should come back or stay home. A plan for a worried evening is part of informed consent. It is not a prediction that the evening will go badly. The final version keeps this question and ties it to the team page, so you know who should answer.

Questions to carry into the appointment

Will the hair be gone for good?
Do not accept that claim from a blog. Ask what the clinician has seen in people similar to you, and what they do if you are disappointed. An “if not” plan is worth more than a slogan.

How much does it hurt?
This page cannot know. Ask, ask how to pause, and decide after the consultation. A caption that says painless is not an examination.

There is already a rash on the area.
Show them. Do not cover it and hope. Postponing, refusing, or choosing another area are all acceptable clinical answers.

I might want to walk out.
Then walk out. Keeping a home method is a complete decision.

The final version needs the focus keyword in the opening sentence, real internal links to the treatment page, the team page and the acne article, and headings that name “before”, “during” and “after” more clearly for search.

Laser Hair Removal: What to Expect Before, During and After Treatment

1,117 words. The assigned range is 1,000–1,200.

Laser hair removal is a clinic visit, not a bottle you add to a basket. People book it because they want a proper conversation about whether a clinic treatment belongs in their life. This page explains what that conversation tends to involve, before, during and after. It does not promise that hair will stop, that skin will look a certain way, or that you will feel nothing.

Suitability is individual. Hair colour, skin, hormones, medicines and the area of the body all change the answer. Only a qualified clinician who has seen you can give it. If a page, including this one, speaks as though it already knows, close it.

Before laser hair removal, book a conversation

Start with a consultation, not with a decision you made from a photo. Read the clinic’s laser hair removal (https://www.kayaskinclinic.com/uae/en/treatments/laser-hair-removal) page so you know what they say they offer, then bring your questions to a person. About Kaya Clinic (https://www.kayaskinclinic.com/uae/en/about-us) is background, not a substitute for the appointment. You are allowed to leave without booking. You are allowed to ask for instructions in writing.

What to bring to the consultation
Write this down so you do not forget it in the room.

- Medicines you take, including anything you put on the skin.

- Skin conditions you know about, and any area that is sore, broken or infected.
- Recent time in the sun, and any self-tan still on the skin.
- How you remove hair now, and roughly when you last did it.
- Whether you are pregnant, trying to become pregnant, or breastfeeding. Say so. Do not wait to be asked.
- Any hormonal condition, or a change in hair that arrived with a change in health. State it. Let them decide what it means.

The clinician can only work with what you say and what they can see.

Questions that decide whether you continue

Ask these out loud. Is this area suitable for me, and why? Will you look at the skin first, and do you test a small patch before a wider visit? Which of my usual hair-removal methods should I stop, and when? Follow their timetable. Do not borrow one from a video. What eye protection do you use if the area is on the face? What should I avoid afterwards, and what should make me call the same day? Who in the dermatology team (https://www.kayaskinclinic.com/uae/en/meet-the-experts) will actually do the visit?

If the answers are vague, you do not have to continue. A clear “this is not suitable” is a successful consultation.

During a laser visit

The clinician should say what they are about to do before they do it. You should know which area, how you will be positioned, and how to ask for a pause. A visit where you feel you cannot speak is the wrong visit.

People describe the sensation in different words. This page will not call it comfortable, quick or mild. Ask what patients usually report, and treat that as the clinic’s experience, not as a promise for your skin. If it is more than you can accept, say so.

Time in the room depends on the area. A single duration quoted without looking at you is a guess. Ask for their estimate for your area, and ask what happens if they stop early. Eye protection matters near the eyes. Ask what you will wear and what the clinician will wear. Sunglasses from your bag are not clinic equipment.

Ask why they chose the device for your skin and hair. You do not need to become an engineer. You need a plain reason. “It is what we always use” is weaker than “we chose this because of what we saw today”.

After a laser visit

Before you leave, ask what is ordinary to notice that day and what is a reason to call. Write it down. Only the person who treated you can say what they expect in your case. Do not judge your evening against a stranger’s photo.

Ask about sun, heat, exercise, makeup and any product you planned to put on that area. The number of days is their instruction, not a number this article should invent. If they give you a sheet, follow the sheet. If they only say “you will be fine”, ask them to be precise before you go home.

Do not pick, scratch or scrub the area. Do not book a wax or a peel on the same skin because the calendar looked empty. If another treatment from the clinic's skin, hair and body list (https://www.kayaskinclinic.com/uae/en/treatments) is on your mind, ask whether the two can sit close together.

A clinician may talk about further visits, or may refuse. This page will not tell you how many visits you need. If your hair is very light, grey or white, or your hormones have been changing, ask whether that changes their advice.

Who this page will not advise

This is not a diagnosis and not a treatment plan. It will not give permission to treat infected, broken or recently operated skin at home, and it will not offer a guarantee. A guarantee is not something a careful clinic page should print.

If the skin is already breaking out, painful or scarred, say so. You may need a different conversation first. The piece on acne care basics (/acne-care-basics-daily-habits-and-when-to-see-a-dermatologist) covers daily habits and when a dermatologist should see the skin. It also refuses to promise a clear complexion. Children, and anyone who cannot consent, need a clinician's decision with the right adult present. This article does not set an age rule. The clinic does.

Questions people ask before they book

Does laser hair removal guarantee the hair will stop?

No. Ask what the clinician has seen in people with hair and skin like yours, and what they will do if you are unhappy. A plan for "if not" is more useful than a promise.

Will it hurt?

Nobody here can feel your skin. Ask what people report, ask how you can pause, and decide after the consultation. Do not book because a caption said the visit was painless.

Can I book it on skin that already has acne or a rash?

Tell the clinician and let them look. Do not cover the area and hope it will not matter. They may postpone, refuse, or treat a different area. All three are proper answers.

What if I want to leave?

Then leave. A consultation exists so you can decide. Staying with shaving or another home method is a finished decision, not a failure.

Take these questions to a real appointment. The clinic page describes the service. The person in the room decides whether it is for you.

Final SEO check: laser hair removal

Edited from the draft before submission.

- The focus keyword is now the first two words of the article. The draft reached it only inside the opening paragraph.
- Headings now say "before laser hair removal", "during a laser visit" and "after a laser visit", so the secondary keywords are visible in the outline.

- Internal links were added to the treatment page, the about page, the dermatology team, the treatment list, and the acne article. The draft had none.
- The patch-test passage stayed, and it still refuses to invent a waiting period.
- A pass for result language removed nothing that promised an outcome, because the draft did not contain one. The final keeps the explicit refusals: no guarantee, no pain claim, no session count, no age invented for the clinic.
- Meta title and description are in `seo-block.md`. The description asks the reader to book a consultation. It does not say the treatment will work.
- Final word count is inside 1,000–1,200.

Acne Care Basics: Daily Skin Habits and When to See a Dermatologist

1,071 words. The assigned range is 1,000–1,200.

Status: draft. Not the submitted version.

A sensible week of acne care basics has two parts. One is a gentle habit at the sink. The other is a moment when you stop trying new things and let a dermatologist see the skin. Neither part is a promise that the spots will go. A routine that suited someone else can sting you. If your own clinician has already given instructions, those instructions win over this draft.

Nothing here is a dose, a brand you must buy, or a count of clinic visits.

Stay gentle on purpose

Home care is for not making the skin angrier. The strongest product in the cupboard is often the wrong one, because sore skin is harder to assess later.

Wash with a gentle cleanser and your hands. Skip the rough cloth. Use the rhythm your clinician set, if they set one. Lukewarm water is enough. Very hot water and a hard flannel feel serious and leave tightness behind. Pat the skin dry. If a headscarf, helmet, collar or mask sits on the skin for hours, wash that skin gently too. Do not announce that the fabric caused the spots. Mention it at the appointment and let a trained person weigh it.

Keep your hands off individual spots. Squeezing adds a wound. It is not treatment. Remove makeup before sleep. “Non-comedogenic” on a label is the maker’s hint, not a guarantee, and your clinician can tell you whether makeup belongs in your week at all.

Change one product at a time. Three new things on the same morning make a mystery. If something stings hard, or the skin swells, weeps or becomes very sore, stop and ask. Do not continue because the bottle mentioned purging. Ask a clinician about sun protection instead of copying a number from a forum. Some prescribed or clinic treatments increase sun sensitivity. A fresh pillowcase and a wiped phone are ordinary hygiene. They are not a cure, and continuing spots are not a character flaw.

The limit of a habit

A habit does not choose an acid, a tablet or a machine. It does not prove a food is guilty. Food questions belong with someone who knows your health. A short diary is fair to bring. Cutting out meals because a caption said so is not.

Two careful weeks that look unchanged are not a failure. Some patterns need training. Switching to a harsher wash out of frustration is how skin becomes both spotty and raw. If you also want hair removed on the same area, do not book both ideas in secret. Say both in one consultation.

Signs that the sink is not enough

Arrange a proper look if the spots are deep, painful or swelling. Arrange one if marks or pits worry you, or if the pattern returns after you have been gentle. If the skin is hot or weeping, or you feel unwell, get care promptly rather than shopping for another scrub. Do not use someone else's prescription, and do not buy a strong product just because the bottle looks clinical.

Also book if your sleep, your work or your willingness to go out has changed. You do not need a speech about vanity first. You may also book from plain curiosity, knowing the visit might end in advice and nothing else.

The first conversation

Expect questions about what you have used, what you take, and how the month goes, plus a look at the skin in ordinary light. The clinician might send you home with a habit, or might talk about clinic care. Ask what they think is happening, in ordinary words. Ask what to do and what to stop. Ask what should bring you back, and what should make you call sooner.

Read the names of the team before you travel if the clinic lists them, but do not confuse a web page with a relationship. Ask how the first visit is arranged, and if any further treatment is mentioned, ask what it is for and what it will not be claimed to do. Leave with the home steps written down. "We will sort it" is not a plan. A promise that one visit ends the problem is a reason to be careful, not a reason to relax.

What to take into the room

A dermatologist can do more with a clear history than with a speech about how upset you are, though the upset matters and you should say it. Before you go, note when the spots tend to appear, what you have put on the skin in the last month, and which product you stopped because it hurt. If you are comfortable, a photo taken in daylight on a typical day can remind both of you what "usual" looks like. Do not edit the photo. Do not start a new product the night before so the appointment sees a different face from the one you live with.

Write your three questions on paper. In the room it is easy to nod and leave without the home steps. The final version turns this preparation into the consultation section and links the clinic pages a reader would open next. It still does not promise that the visit will clear the skin.

Questions this draft leaves you with

Does a gentle wash mean I can skip the dermatologist?

No. The wash only tries to limit irritation. Pain, scarring or real distress are reasons to book. Mild skin that you are happy to watch can be watched, on purpose.

A spot looks ready to squeeze.

Leave it. Swelling or strong pain is a reason to ask, not a reason to use your thumbs.

Which foods should I drop?

This draft will not say. Bring a diary if you want the question discussed. A stranger's meal plan is not care.

A new product hurt.

Stop. Do not layer a second new product on top. Badly sore, swollen or blistered skin, or feeling unwell, means you should seek care. Slight tightness can rest until the consultation, where you mention it.

The final edit puts the focus keyword in the first line, adds internal links to the acne page, the team, the about page and the laser article, and turns the sign list into a scannable set of lines. The medical boundary stays: no result is promised in either version.

Acne Care Basics: Daily Skin Habits and When to See a Dermatologist

1,130 words. The assigned range is 1,000–1,200.

Acne care basics are two things in the same week: a gentle daily habit, and a clear point at which you stop experimenting and see a dermatologist. Neither half promises that your skin will clear. What calmed a friend can sting you. This page is a way to be kinder to your skin while you wait for advice, and a way to notice when waiting is no longer the plan.

It is not a prescription. It names no dose, no brand you must buy, and no number of clinic visits. If a sentence here conflicts with your clinician, follow the clinician.

Daily skin habits that stay gentle

The aim at home is to avoid making the skin angrier, not to fight it with the harshest product in the cupboard. Sore skin is harder for a dermatologist to read when you finally go.

Washing, without scrubbing

Wash with a gentle cleanser and your hands, not with a rough cloth. If your clinician has already set a rhythm, use theirs. Lukewarm water is enough. Hot water and a flannel used like sandpaper feel thorough and often leave the skin tight. Pat dry. Clean and calm are allowed to be the same thing.

If you wear a headscarf, a helmet, a collar or a mask for long hours, include that skin in the gentle wash. Do not conclude that the fabric caused the spots. That is a claim this page will not make. Mention the fabric at the appointment so it can be considered.

Hands, makeup and new products

Do not squeeze, pick or drain a spot. It is how people add a mark they then regret, and it is not treatment. Take makeup off before sleep. If you use makeup, you can look for “non-comedogenic” on the label and ask whether makeup is fine for you at all. A label is a hint from the maker, not a certificate.

Introduce one new product at a time. If you change three things on Monday, you will not know which one disagreed with you. If a product stings sharply, or the skin becomes very sore, swollen or weeping, stop it and ask for help. Do not push through because a bottle said purging.

Ask about sun protection rather than copying a number from a forum. Some treatments make skin more sensitive to the sun. Your clinician knows whether yours do. Change a pillowcase when it is due, and wipe the phone you press to your cheek. These are cleanliness steps.

They are not a cure, and they are not a reason to blame yourself if spots continue.

What these habits do not do

They do not replace a dermatologist, and they do not name the right acid, tablet or machine for you. They do not prove that a food caused the breakout. Diet belongs with the clinician who knows the rest of your health. You can take a simple diary. You should not cut out a food group because a caption said so.

A careful fortnight that looks the same is not a personal failure. Some patterns need training. Carrying on with a rougher wash is how people arrive both spotty and sore.

If you are also thinking about hair removal on the same area, do not stack the plans. Read what to expect from laser hair removal (/laser-hair-removal-before-during-and-after) only as questions, and tell the clinician about both wishes in one visit.

When to see a dermatologist

Book a proper look, rather than another week of experiments, if any of these are true.

- The spots are painful, deep or swelling.
- You are seeing marks or pits that worry you.
- The same pattern keeps returning after you have been gentle for a while.
- The skin is hot or weeping, or you feel unwell with it. Seek care promptly. Do not try a new scrub tonight.
- You are about to buy a strong product, or someone has offered you their prescription. Do not share prescription products.
- The skin is changing your sleep, your class or work, or whether you will leave the house. You do not have to call that vanity before you ask for help.

Curiosity is a valid reason to book, as long as you know the visit may end in advice rather than a procedure.

What a first acne consultation is for

A first visit is a history and a look. The clinician will ask what you have used, what you take, and how the skin behaves across the month. They may say a home habit is enough, or they may suggest clinic care. The acne care (https://www.kayaskinclinic.com/uae/en/treatments/acne-acne-scar) page is how the clinic frames that care. The person in the room sets the plan.

Ask three things. What do you think is going on, in plain words? What should I do at home, and what should I stop? What would make you want to see me again, and what should make me call sooner?

The dermatology team (https://www.kayaskinclinic.com/uae/en/meet-the-experts) page lets you read names before you travel. A name on a website is not yet a relationship. About the clinic (https://www.kayaskinclinic.com/uae/en/about-us) can explain how a first visit is arranged. It cannot say how your skin will respond. If the plan includes something from the wider treatment list (https://www.kayaskinclinic.com/uae/en/treatments), ask what it is for and what they will not claim it does.

Write the home instructions down before you leave. “Use this, skip that, come back if this happens" is a plan. "We will sort it" is not. No honest clinician can promise the first visit ends the problem.

Questions people ask

If I follow a gentle routine, do I still need a dermatologist?

The routine only limits extra irritation. It is not a test you must pass before booking. If spots are painful, scarring or deeply upsetting, book. If they are mild and you are content to watch, watch on purpose.

Is it useful to squeeze a spot that has come to a head?

No. Leave it. If a spot is very painful or the area is swelling, ask a clinician. Do not use two thumbs.

Can this page tell me which foods to drop?

It will not. Take a food-and-skin diary if you want that discussed. Dropping meals on a stranger's advice is not acne care.

What if a new product makes my skin sore?

Stop it. Do not add a second product to calm the first. If the skin is badly sore, swollen or blistered, or you feel unwell, seek care. If it is only a little tight, rest it and mention it at the consultation.

Acne care basics are patience at the sink and honesty about what a sink can do. The rest belongs with a dermatologist who can see you.

Final SEO check: acne care basics

Edited from the draft before submission.

- The focus keyword now opens the article. The draft buried "acne care basics" after a clause about a sensible week.
- "Daily skin habits" and "when to see a dermatologist" are H2s, matching the assigned topic and the secondary keywords.
- The signs that mean "book" are a list, which the draft wrote as a paragraph. The preparation notes moved into the consultation section.
- Internal links were added to the acne page, the dermatology team, the about page, the treatment list, and the laser article. The draft named those ideas without links.
- No food was banned, no product was dosed, and no sentence promises clearer skin. "Non-comedogenic" is described as a maker's hint. Squeezing is still discouraged as a habit, not as a cure.
- The instruction to seek care promptly when skin is hot, weeping, or accompanied by feeling unwell was kept. That is a safety line, not a treatment claim.
- Meta title and description are in `seo-block.md`. Final word count is inside 1,000–1,200.

Five-minute walkthrough: Amna

Spoken notes for the Day 10 walkthrough. Read at a steady pace, about five minutes.

I am Amna, and the practice site is Kaya Skin Clinic. The address we were given opens the UAE English site. There is no Pakistan section on that host, so I audited the live UAE pages and I did not pretend the clinic was somewhere else.

I also had no keyword sheet in the workspace, so I did not invent search volumes. The focus keywords come from the assigned topics and from the job of each page: a skin, hair and body clinic; laser hair removal; acne care; about Kaya Clinic; and the dermatology team.

Length was the main fault on the live snippets. The homepage title was 68 characters and started with the brand. The description was 158 characters and spent them on clinic counts and customer counts. Those figures do not even match other text on the homepage, which showed different numbers. I deleted every count. The new title starts with “skin, hair and body clinic” and ends with Kaya Clinic. The description is 149 characters and asks the reader to book a consultation.

The laser title was 82 characters and promised long-term hair reduction and smooth skin. The description was 187 characters and repeated that promise. Mine is “Laser hair removal: questions to ask”. It offers a consultation and says the page is not a promise. The acne title was 79 characters and talked about solutions. The description was 213 characters and teased “how many sessions you may need”. I will not invent a session count. The new description tells the reader to learn the basics and book. About-us led with a customer figure and repeated the brand. Experts called the team the best and missed a space before the pipe. Both now lead with the topic and end with the brand, inside 60 and inside 140 to 155.

The blog keywords are “laser hair removal” and “acne care basics”. Each meta title starts with the keyword and ends “Kaya Clinic”. Each description asks the reader to book, and neither says the skin will change. The slugs are the topics in full.

On the page, the laser article uses the keyword in the first words and in the H2 “before laser hair removal”. During and after are their own H2s. H3s cover what to bring and what to ask. The acne article opens on the keyword, then uses H2s for daily skin habits and for when to see a dermatologist. H3s cover washing and hands. Both articles end in an FAQ. Internal links go to the five audited pages, and each blog links to the other so a reader with both questions can move without searching.

I did not copy the clinic’s treatment claims. I did not say a visit is painless, permanent, or guaranteed. I did not ban a food or name a dose. Where a timetable matters, the article tells the reader to follow the clinician’s sheet. The one firm safety line is to seek care promptly if skin is hot, weeping, or the person feels unwell, and not to share someone else’s prescription.

The drafts had the same boundaries and a weaker shape. The keyword sat too late, and there were no internal links. The final pass added the links, moved the keyword forward, and kept each article between 1,000 and 1,200 words.

On the marking split, the five-page audit is the ten points, the titles and descriptions are the thirty, the two finals are the forty, and showing up with the tracker and this walkthrough is the twenty for deadlines and feedback. I would ask the trainer one thing before anyone publishes: the greeting says Ammara and the brief says Amna, and I have filed the work under Amna. I would also ask whether the brand line must be “Kaya Skin Clinic” in full. I used “Kaya Clinic”, which is what several live titles already say, because the full name pushes a keyword off the front of a 60-character title. I will not add a result claim to buy those characters back. That is what I would walk through on day 10.
